

We will start with the opening Statement on the Adoption of Cross-Border Securities-Based Swap Rules under Title VII of the Dodd-Frank Act, chair Mary Jo White, Washington, D.C. Good morning. This is an open meeting of the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission on June 25, 2014. Today, the Commission will consider a recommendation of the staff to adopt core rules and critical guidance on cross-border security-based swap activities under the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act. Title VII of the Dodd-Frank Act created an important and entirely new regulatory framework for the over-the-counter derivatives market. Transforming this framework into a series of strong rules is one of the most important tasks remaining before the Commission in discharging our responsibility to address the lessons of the last financial crisis. The events of 2008 and 2009 – and the significant role derivatives played in those events – still reverberate throughout our economy. Properly constructed, the Commission’s rules under Title VII should mitigate significant risks to the U.S. financial system, bring transparency to previously opaque bilateral markets, and provide critical new protections for swap customers and counterparties. And the vital regulatory protections of Title VII are not confined to large multi-national banks and other market participants – they are also essential to preserving the stability of a financial system that is vital to all Americans. As we proceed with robust to robustly carry out the objectives of Title VII, we must, at the same time, do so with a clear understanding and appreciation of the limitations within which we operate. The reach of our statutory authority, actions by other supervisors in the global market, and close consultation and coordination with our colleagues at the CFTC are among the considerations that must also guide our approach. The Commission has already adopted a number of the foundational rules under Title VII. And I have asked the staff to advance their recommendations on the remaining rules in parallel, guided by the Commission’s 2012 – roadmap – for implementing Title VII. Consistent with that roadmap, we will next look to consider a recommendation on security-based swap transaction reporting and the registration and regulation of security-based swap data repositories. It is critical that we proceed expeditiously to complete the establishment of a strong, enduring set of rules to govern the security-based swaps market that will guide investors and other market participants for years to come. The security-based swap market is global, with most transactions taking place across jurisdictional lines. Without clarity on how the Commission’s regulatory framework will apply to cross-border activities, implementation of the Title VII requirements would fall short of achieving the statute’s important regulatory policy goals. The final rules and guidance on cross-border coverage and operability that we are considering today lay the foundation for moving forward on our remaining Title VII rules. Last year, the Commission published a comprehensive proposal mapping out the cross-border application of the various substantive requirements in Title VII. That proposal set forth our preliminary thinking on cross-border issues across the full range of regulatory categories and requirements under Title VII. Today’s final rules and guidance implement a central piece of that proposal, defining who is – and who is not – covered by our regulatory regime. Among other things, they specify when market participants engaged in cross-border swaps activity may be subject to SEC regulation as dealers or major participants. And they define a number of pivotal terms – such as a – U.S. person – that cut across Title VII’s cross-border landscape.
